Narrative Summary:

Koch Judicial Settlement: The case against Koch Industries involved 315 oil spills over several years in Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas and Louisiana. Koch, EPA/DOJ and the State of Texas agreed to a consent decree which became effective on March 7, 2000, that provided for Koch to pay a civil penalty of $35 million to the plaintiffs, as well as implement several major pipe line system improvement programs for the affected Koch pipe lines. Of the $35 million penalty, $15 million was paid to the State of Texas, and $15 million was paid to the Environmental Protection Agency. In addition, $2.5 million was to be spent by Koch on environmental projects approved by EPA and another $2.5 million on projects approved by the State of Texas. There are two environmental projects that must be approved by EPA: a $1.0 million Pipeline Safety Education project and a $1.5 million project for Koch to purchase and maintain properties set aside for wetlands or wildlife habitat. Koch will spend another $2.5 million on four projects in Texas. Under the injunctive relief part of the consent decree, Koch must develop and implement programs that will affect over 2,565 miles of Koch pipelines that address existing pipe line conditions, leak detection and prevention, maintenance and inspections and training for company personnel. All of the injunctive relief programs must meet or exceed sound industry practices.
